Minnesota's governor signs bill legalizing recreational marijuana, so what's next in WI?

Wisconsin is an 'island' where neither medical nor recreational marijuana is legal Minnesota Gov. Tim Walz signed legislation Tuesday, May 30, 2023, legalizing the use of recreational marijuana, making it the 23rd state to do so.

"This has been a long journey with a lot of folks involved," Walz said during a signing ceremony at the State Capitol.

The move solidifies Wisconsin even more as a state surrounded by others that have legalized either recreational and/or medical marijuana use.

"We are surrounded," Wisconsin Gov. Tony Evers said Tuesday in response to Minnesota's action. "We are an island, and all that tax money that Wisconsinites spend across the border should be coming to us, not to other states."

Evers included legalizing marijuana as part of his state budget proposal — a provision Republicans quickly stripped away.

"The speaker's made clear he doesn't want anything to do with this, and he controls his part of the world," Evers said.

Private conversations are ongoing among a group of Assembly Republicans regarding legislation that would legalize medical marijuana.

"We are looking to say medical marijuana for people who have a truly awful long-term medical condition should be something we at least consider," Assembly Speaker Robin Vos recently said in an interview for "UP-FRONT." "So I don't think we're going to have anything before this fall. We are trying to be very deliberate in something that can stick up with our principles. I don't think recreational (marijana) should ever happen."

Recent public polling by Marquette Law School indicates about two-thirds of Wisconsinites support legalization.

Center for Teaching Entrepreneurship hosts '2nd Annual Big Hat Soiree'

On Thursday, May 18, 2023, The Center for Teaching Entrepreneurship (CTE) hosted their "2nd Annual Big Hat Soiree" at the Bradley Pavilion, Marcus Center for Performing Arts. The Big Hat Soiree honored CTE's late founder, ReDonna Rodgers, and the vision she provided for CTE's work with young people in Milwaukee. Her vision continues with dedicated volunteers, programs to learn entrepreneurship and financial literacy, engaged students, school partnerships, supportive donors and an entrepreneurial spirit and mindset throughout. As part of event Royal Capital Founder and CEO Kevin Newell was presented with the Center for Teaching Entrepreneurship's ReDonna Rodgers Entrepreneur Leadership Award. Holy Redeemer Christian Academy Chief Education Officer Dr. Floyd Williams, Jr, was presented with the Center for Teaching Entrepreneurship's Educator Award. The success of the Big Hat Soiree will provide support from donors, inspire volunteers and develop new partnerships.

Wear orange for Hadiya

May 29, 2023, was Memorial Day in the United States, and the long weekend that is traditionally observed with shared remembrance, made headlines again for the shared all-American epidemic of gun violence. The nonprofit Gun Violence Archive, which keeps track of American gun violence incidents, noted there were at least 175 people killed and another 496 injured during the Memorial Day weekend; and 20 mass shootings in which four or more people were injured or killed. This included the mass shooting on a crowded beachside promenade in Hollywood, FL, that injured nine people, including four children, the youngest just one year old.

Other shootings happened during neighborhood or community conflicts. Many happened at home, with a family member's own gun. The Gun Violence Archive now calculates that more than 17,000 people have died so far this year in the U.S. from guns, including more than 100 children under age 12.

June is National Gun Violence Awareness Month; and June 2-4 was Wear Orange Weekend, to join thousands of others across the country calling for an end to gun violence in all of its forms, including domestic violence, suicide, and city gun violence. The Wear Orange movement began in honor of Hadiya Pendleton, an honors student and drum majorette who was shot and killed on a Chicago playground in January 2013 just days after she had performed in President Obama's second inaugural parade. As President Obama gave his State of the Union speech that year, he remembered Hadiya:

"She was 15 years old. She loved Fig Newtons and lip gloss . . . She was so good to her friends, they all thought they were her best friend. Just three weeks ago, she was here, in Washington, with her classmates, performing for her country at my inauguration. And a week later, she was shot and killed in a Chicago park after school, just a mile away from my house."

As a sixth-grader, Hadiya had appeared in an anti-gang video to encourage other young people to avoid gang violence, saying, "It's your job as students to say 'no' to gangs and 'yes' to a great future." Hadiya could have meant a future like her own; the talented high school sophomore was excelling at her college preparatory school, doing everything right, with the world ahead of her. But all that changed because of a gun.

Wear Orange began on June 2, 2015, the day that would have been Hadiya's 18th birthday. It is now observed nationally every year on the first Friday in June and the weekend that follows. It was Hadiya's friends who originally chose to remember her by wearing orange, the color hunters wear in the woods to protect themselves and others.

Hadiya Pendleton deserved to be protected. She, and the thousands of other children who have been killed by guns in our nation in the ten years since she died, deserved the freedom to grow up. Last year, former First Lady Michelle Obama unveiled plans for the Hadiya Pendleton Winter Garden at the Obama Presidential Center in Chicago. Mrs. Obama said, "I never had the chance to meet Hadiya while she was alive, but after she died, I was able to spend some time with her loved ones. I learned about how she was an honor student, how much she loved music, how she loved going out to get ice cream with her friends. And the more I heard, the more I understood the extraordinary potential inside her—a potential that was stolen by the epidemic of gun violence."

She continued: "Like me, Hadiya was raised by parents who wanted to give her opportunities they never had. They signed her up for volleyball, cheerleading, and a dance ministry at church. They supported her education, and with their encouragement, she became a star student. From an early age, Hadiya's parents made sacrifices to introduce her to opportunities throughout Chicago so that she could one day find her place in the world."

Hadiya, who should be turning 26 right now, never got that chance. We must never tire of the really hard work demanded to transform the pervasive culture of violence and pervasive presence of guns in America. We must love our children more than the gun manufacturers and some NRA members love their guns. We must love our country enough to ensure the safety of our children and of all of us; and demand the future free from gun violence that all of our children deserve.

OUR HISTORY

AN EXPLORATION OF OUR LIVES AND LEGACIES

Different fight, same goal:
How the black freedom movement inspired early gay activists

The civil rights and early "homophile" movements shared leaders, ideas and, ultimately, the same goal, according to historians.

On April 25, 1965, three teenagers refused to leave Dewey's Restaurant in Philadelphia after employees repeatedly denied service to "homosexuals and persons wearing nonconformist clothing," according to Drum magazine, which was created by the Janus Society, an early gay rights group.

The teens were arrested and charged with disorderly conduct, and Janus Society members protested outside of the restaurant for the next five days, according to Marc Stein, a history professor at San Francisco State University.

"Unlike so many other episodes, it kind of combined issues of homosexuality and trans issues," Stein, author of "Rethinking the Gay and Lesbian Movement," told NBC News.

On May 2, 1965 three more people staged a second sit-in at Dewey's. Though the restaurant called the police, the protesters weren't arrested, and after a few hours they left voluntarily, according to a Janus Society newsletter. The Society wrote that the protests and sit-ins were successful in preventing future denials of service and arrests.

The sit-in at Dewey's is among a long list of examples that show a "direct line" to the black civil rights movement, according to Stein. Specifically, sit-ins organized by gay activists in the '60s appear to be directly inspired by protests held in 1960 by black college students at Woolworth's lunch counter in Greensboro, North Carolina, against racial segregation.

Early lesbian gay bisexual transgender queer activists (LGBTQ, though they didn't use that acronym at the time) adopted many of the civil rights movement's strategies, Stein said, and they relied on much of the foundation laid by black civil rights activists.

But the two movements weren't necessarily separate — they often overlapped — and so influence happened in a few ways, Stein said.

"Influence can be the influence of ideas, and specifically, ideologies, influence of strategies," he said. "Influence can also come in the form of people who move between movements, or who are engaged in multiple movements, and we do have examples of that in the early LGBTQ movement."

The influence — or 'plagiarism' — of ideas

Queer activists were building a movement long before the 1969 Stonewall uprising in New York City, which is widely referred to as a turning point in the LGBTQ rights movement. Though Stonewall was a pivotal moment, activists like Frank Kameny were organizing for gay rights well before.

Kameny co-founded the Mattachine Society in Washington, DC, one of the first homophile groups ("homophile" being the adjective of choice at the time), and he drew strategies directly from the black civil rights movement, according to Eric Cervini, a historian and author of "The Deviant's War," which focuses on Kameny and the early gay rights movement.

Black lesbian activist Ernestine Eckstein (left) participating in a gay rights protest outside the White House in 1965.

"Every single element of what we know as Pride and gay rights and, especially, the pre-Stonewall homophile movement, was borrowed from the Black Freedom Movement," Cervini said. "Frank Kameny's primary role, what made him so brilliant but also complex of a historical figure, was that he served primarily as a Xerox machine copying different elements of the Black Freedom Movement and applying that to a previously nonmilitant, nonprotesting movement."

For example, Cervini said Kameny and a delegation of eight Mattachine Society of Washington members attended the 1963 March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom, where Martin Luther King, Jr., delivered his "I Have a Dream" speech. The march was organized by Bayard Rustin, who had been arrested in 1953 for having sex with another man. In 1963, U.S Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-SC), a segregationist, called Rustin a "sexual pervert" on the Senate floor in an effort to discredit the march, according to Out History.

Kameny and the delegates saw that, even though Rustin had been exposed, 200,000 Americans still attended the march, and it became a historic moment, according to Cervini.

"So these white gay activists, who previously had been refusing to take to the streets, looked around and said, 'Maybe it's time, maybe not right now, but maybe in the near future'," Cervini said. (In fact, in 1979, activists would organize a National March on Washington for Gay and Lesbian Rights, which drew an estimated 200,000 protesters, according to the National LGBTQ Chamber of Commerce).

Within a year of the 1963 march, gay rights activist Randy Wicker began picketing the U.S. Army Induction Center in New York City, and a few months after that, Kameny began picketing the White House and Philadelphia's Independence Hall. Cervini also noted that Kameny modeled his phrase "Gay Is Good," which was used on protest signs and buttons, on the Black Power movement's "Black Is Beautiful."

A few years later, in 1966, Wicker and three activists with the Mattachine Society's New York City chapter organized a "sip-in" at Julius' Bar to challenge a New York State Liquor Authority rule that said bars couldn't serve "disorderly" customers. In practice, bars would refuse to serve LGBTQ people out of fear that they'd lose their

Ten ways you may be ruining your hearing

When you think about hearing loss, do major injuries come to mind? While it's true that very loud noises and physical damage can cause hearing loss, there are a few everyday activities that can erode your hearing a little at a time. The effects might not be noticeable immediately but over time, you'll find it harder and harder to hear.

1. You use cotton swabs

Most people know that cotton swabs can damage your eardrums if pushed too far into the ear. What you might not realize is that even if you stick to the outer parts of the ear, you may be pushing wax back inside the canal. This compacted earwax can obstruct the canal and affect your hearing.

2. You're not diving safely

An important aspect of diving properly is having the right equipment. As you're descending, you need to ensure that the balance in your ears is maintained. If this doesn't happen, you could end up damaging your eardrums.

3. You don't protect your ears on airplanes

There's no doubt that airplanes are one of the loudest modes of transportation around. If you're flying, consider using noise-canceling earphones or headphones. In an ideal world, you'd be able to choose a seat in the plane that's not as loud but it's not wise to count on that option.

4. Your diabetes risk is high

The body is a complex combination of systems, which means an issue in one area can affect something else that seems unrelated. When it comes to your hearing, diabetes can weaken blood vessels that are integral to your hearing. If you're at risk for diabetes, you should get it under control quickly.

5. You take certain medications

While all medications have side effects, there are a select few that have what are known as ototoxic effects. That means they are poisonous or damaging to the ear. If you're taking antibiotics, aspirin, blood pressure medications, or you're on chemotherapy, talk to your doctor about alternatives.

6. You're not getting enough potassium

A balanced diet is essential to being healthy. Potassium, in particular, has been found to be important for how the middle ear converts sound to signals the brain can interpret. To make sure you're getting the right amount of potassium, you should include bananas, beets, spinach, potatoes, and oranges in your diet.

7. You don't use headphones properly

Many people use headphones to block out external noise. The issue with that is you might not be using the right ones. If you're constantly increasing the volume of what you're listening to, then you're likely to damage your ears. What you should be doing instead is using noise-canceling earphones or headphones that fit your ears well.

8. You're frequently in noisy environments

If you're going out to concerts or clubs, you expect it to be loud but you might be underestimating how loud things can get. In this case, earplugs are a great way to protect your ears from loud noises that can cause damage.

9. You're not getting your hearing checked

Even persons who are having their annual check-up may forget to cover all their bases. That includes your hearing. These checks are important because auditory tests are more likely to pick up on changes in your hearing that you won't notice on your own.

10. You don't protect your ears at work

If your job includes the operation of heavy machinery, power tools, and other loud equipment, you should make sure that you're using protective gear. Without the right gear, the noise will steadily wear away the vulnerable parts of the ear and affect your hearing.

When to see a doctor

Apart from getting an annual check-up, you should never ignore any signs of hearing loss.

That includes having trouble hearing the people around you or needing to increase the volume on the television more than you used to.

It's true that loud noises can cause temporary hearing loss but watch out for anything that doesn't resolve within 24 hours. You should be especially cautious if you have persistent ringing in your ears.

Your ears are a delicate part of your body and you can damage the internal structures more easily than you think.

Different fight, same goals

liquor license. The sip-in, like the sit-in at Dewey's, used the same tactics as the college students at Woolworth's lunch counter, according to Stein.

Stein said black civil rights movement strategies also affected how early LGBTQ activists conducted peaceful demonstrations. A coalition of gay and lesbian organizations held a yearly peaceful protest at Independence Hall called the Annual Reminder from 1965 to 1969, which Stein said were influenced by the early civil rights demonstrations in which demonstrators were instructed to dress respectably, with women in dresses and men in suits.

Cervini said civil rights demonstrators dressed up as a "reclamation of morality that was so effective when you look at the images of Montgomery or Birmingham or Greensboro." He said Time magazine even drew attention to the fact that young civil rights activists looked like they were going to church, and, as a result, "How can you possibly claim that those Southern whites are the ones protecting morality?" he said. "So the early gay activists tried to emulate that same tactic, by using respectability as a political tool."

On the other hand, gay and trans activists were also affected by the Black Power movement and urban uprisings, according to Stein. He said LGBTQ rebellions like the 1966 Compton's Cafeteria riot in San Francisco and the Stonewall uprising a few years later were likely influenced by events like the 1965 Watts Rebellion in Los Angeles, where six days of riots erupted between police and the predominantly black community.

"I would argue that the Black Power movement was just as influential as the civil rights movement," Stein said. "Black Power ideologies and strategies came to influence the movement very much so in the second half of the '60s and then into the '70s, so there were both of those influences — peaceful, respectable demonstrations on the one hand, and a more aggressive militant action sometimes including riots on the other."

Cervini said FBI reports explicitly connect the Black Freedom Movement and the early homophile movement.

"We can connect those two movements — Bayard Rustin, Frank Kameny and Randy Wicker — through FBI surveillance, and from informants within these organizations," Cervini said. "They were the ones informing the FBI that the gays, the homosexuals were learning from and discussing copying the Black Freedom Movement.

"This idea of a coalition between these two organizations — that the Black Freedom Movement might be inspiring this other group of American citizens who are also marginalized, and the fact that they may both be taking to the streets, perhaps in coordination — that is what scared them the most," Cervini said of the FBI and Southern racist segregationists.

However, the homophile movement, at least in New York and Washington, never made that coalition a reality, Cervini added.

He said he uses the word "plagiarism" to describe how Kameny used civil rights tactics without working with or crediting the activists whose tactics he used.

"You are using and borrowing tactics from another movement, but not giving proper credit and not making space for people at the intersection of those two movements," Cervini said. "I think it raises the question of the moral acceptability of that."

Influence by intersection

In some cities, there was more of a coalition and less borrowing. The idea of one movement having an "influence" over the other could give the false notion that the fight for black civil rights was comprised entirely of black activists and the fight for LGBTQ rights was solely made up of whites, cautioned Steven Fullwood, co-founder of the Nomadic Archivists Project, which documents and preserves black history.

"There's black people in parts of both of those movements," Fullwood said, noting that there were black people involved in both the Mattachine Society and Daughters of Bilitis, the first lesbian rights group.

Marsha P. Johnson

Fullwood also mentioned Marsha P. Johnson, who is credited as being a central figure in the Stonewall uprising, and Cervini cited Ernestine Eckstein (also known as Ernestine Eppenger), who was active in the Black Freedom Movement and the Daughters of Bilitis in the '60s.

Stein also gave the example of Kiyoshi Kuromiya, a Japanese American, anti-war activist who participated in the Annual Reminders at Independence Hall and had previously gone South and participated in civil rights marches. Kuromiya co-founded the Gay Liberation Front's Philadelphia chapter and became a spokesperson for a homosexual workshop at the Black Panther's Revolutionary People's Constitutional Convention in September 1970, according to Stein.

The sister of Layleen Polanco, a trans woman who died in Rikers Island Jail in 2019, speaks to a crowd gathered outside the Brooklyn Museum for a rally and march for black transgender lives on June 14, 2020.

He gave a presentation "to the huge audience of the convention to applause," Stein said of Kuromiya, citing this as one of many examples showing that the movements weren't fragmented or divided at the time in some cities.

"They were uniting against police violence, state repression, capitalist exploitation and, after all, the Stonewall rebellion was at least in part about a business exploiting its gay and trans customers," Stein said. "So it kind of illustrates the way those issues came together at those particular episodes.

"Any movement that does not take into account the intersectional approach is never going to achieve true liberation."

Some of the major LGBTQ demonstrations, including the 1965 sit-in at Dewey's Restaurant, took place in racially diverse communities, according to Susan Stryker, a scholar of queer and trans history.

She said the sit-in is an example of tactics developed in the black civil rights struggle "becoming useful in situations that are not organized specifically around race, but are organized around questions of sexuality and gender expression and gender presentation.

"So, is that a borrowing of civil rights tactics?" Stryker asked. "Or is it people who are perhaps familiar with this in different contexts of their own lives saying … 'We need to do the same thing on this issue'?"

Stryker said there was also a huge overlap between people who were organizing for racial and economic justice and queer and trans rights in the 1966 Compton's Cafeteria riot, which she described as "one of the first instances that we know about of militant trans resistance to police-based oppression."

The legal blueprint

Many major legal gains for LGBTQ people are also in part due to arguments developed by civil rights lawyers.

"The legal strategy challenging racial segregation, which was pioneered by the NAACP in the 1940s, was really the wellspring from which the LGBTQ equality movement grew," said Alphonso David, a civil rights lawyer and the first black president of the Human Rights Campaign, the country's largest LGBTQ rights group.

In the 1940s and '50s, Thurgood Marshall, who led the NAACP, spent a decade challenging segregation on public transportation, in restaurants and in public schools, David said. Marshall argued a number of cases related to segregation, and then in the mid-'50s he argued Brown v. Board of Education in front of the Supreme Court, which ruled that U.S. state laws segregating schools were unconstitutional.

"It took more than a decade of litigation and argument testing combined with really a lot of sweat equity and strategic partnerships with grassroots organizers to successfully challenge racial segregation in the U.S. Supreme Court," David said.

Marshall's legal strategy, which involved using the due process and equal protection clauses of the 14th Amendment, served as a model that the LGBTQ movement used to challenge the criminalization of homosexuality and the denial of marriage rights.

"We are indebted to the civil rights leaders of the past, because they were really instrumental in outlining the essential objective, which was the guarantee of equal protection and how that should apply to all of us," David said.

Gay rights lawyers also built on major black civil rights decisions to achieve same-sex marriage, according to David. In 1967, the Supreme Court held in Loving v. Virginia that laws banning interracial marriage violate the due process and equal protection clauses. "In that case, the Supreme Court held that, yes, there is a fundamental right to marry," he said.

This same argument was successfully used nearly half a century later in Obergefell v. Hodges, David said, where it was argued that "denying same-sex couples the right to marry violates both the due process and the equal protection clauses of the U.S. Constitution — and we won.

"So that is one perfect example where you see the arguments that were advanced during the civil rights struggle to at least recognize equality for racial minorities being used and applied in the context of LGBTQ people," he added.

'The same goal'

There has been significant overlap between the civil rights and LGBTQ equality movements, Fullwood said, and that's a key takeaway.

"What we have to appreciate is that the arguments that were used in the civil rights movement in the 1960s involved LGBTQ people," Fullwood added, citing a speech given by Black Panther Party founder Huey Newton in 1970.

Outlining the group's position on the two emerging movements, Newton wrote: "Whatever your personal opinions and your insecurities about homosexuality and the various liberation movements among homosexuals and women (and I speak of the homosexuals and women as oppressed groups), we should try to unite with them in a revolutionary fashion."

Today's activists, Fullwood said, have to think about the LGBTQ equality movement as involving black people and the racial justice movement as involving LGBTQ people.

"Any movement that does not take into account the intersectional approach is never going to achieve true liberation," he said. "The black and the LGBTQ movements have the same goal."

Fullwood said he's pleased with the kinds of activists who are engaging multi-issue platforms that "call for different, insightful ways to resist oppression," but that he's occasionally run into the phrase, "This isn't your grandmother's movement."

"If that's the sentiment, I say this: You better hope it's your grandmother's movement, because she and thousands like her made it possible for you to have the language, perspective and insights that you enjoy today," he said. "This is not new. Read. Research. Build. You exist in a river of resistance. Know and embrace that history. It's waiting."
